Occupy Wall Street faces eviction, official says Occupy Wall Street faces eviction, official says Occupy Wall Street has three days to leave an encampment at the foot of the New York Stock Exchange or face forcible eviction, according to Mayor Michael Bloomberg. Bloomberg made the statement after the resignation of Mayor Ed Koch earlier this week left the city facing the biggest crisis in its modern history. "I would hope we can work something out with the protesters who have been there peacefully for a few weeks, but that's not been indicated by anyone at this point," Bloomberg told reporters on Thursday. "They're not going to be able to stay there unless they get some agreement from the city to take them to jail. There's a point of law where they're going to have to leave or be evicted." Bloomberg said he is sympathetic to the protesters' complaints. "They've got a legitimate grievance. They are saying the economy is unfair. That is absolutely right," he said. "But the only way you get it changed is by political action." Occupy has been camped at Zuccotti Park in lower Manhattan since it began with two tents and a drum circle in late September. Police have generally tolerated the protesters, keeping them at a safe distance from the stock exchange, although they have come to blows with some of them in recent days.
