The effect of non-volatile organic base addition (Li_2CO_3) on the structural stability and surface charge of anodic titania nanotube arrays (TONA) is studied in detail. The effect of Li_2CO_3 addition up to a concentration of 1.5 mol/L on the anodic titania nanotube arrays is studied by X-ray diffraction (XRD) and X-ray photoelectron spectroscopy (XPS). X-ray diffraction shows that the nanotube walls are TiO_2 and display a ripple structure without any change in the nanotube dimensions. The addition of Li_2CO_3 to TONA solutions up to 1.5 mol/L results in a titania dissolution and a change in the platinum counter electrode due to its surface oxidation to platinum(2+) in the alkaline conditions.

In the presence of excess Li_2CO_3 (1.5 mol/L), the TONA solution loses stability and the nanotube dimensions and crystallite size increase in solution with the formation of a sol-gel product. XPS analysis indicates that the $\text{PtO}_4(2-)$ associated with the presence of a lithium carbonate species in TONA solution. The addition of an organic base (piperidine) to the solution leads to a pH drop, which again changes the topography of the nanotube arrays and the adsorption of the organic base onto the TONA surfaces. SEM results of the TONA film prepared with piperidine are similar to the results obtained with TONA in solution of Li_2CO_3 . The results suggest a titania dissolution mechanism in the presence of organic bases in alkaline solution, which is to be examined in future studies.
