properties in JavaScript I am starting to learn JavaScript at the moment and have noticed that it seems that public properties are not as simple as just defining a public property as in Java, C# etc. Instead I have to use the getter and setter to access the property. The following works, but I am wondering if I am missing a trick and would like to know: `var test = { }; test.windowText = "hello"; alert( test.windowText ); // "hello"` Where is the property `windowText` defined? I thought that would be a global object but I get undefined. I thought JavaScript worked like PHP where properties can be assigned to variables without the need for the getter and setter. A: You are not missing anything; the global object is `Window` (note that this is not the same as `window.Object`), and it does not have a `windowText` property. In JavaScript objects are just built-in classes; they have no concept of properties; only attributes, and even attributes aren't like properties you find in languages like Java or C#; they're just named values. Also note that the `windowText` property is not defined on the object `test`; it is defined on the global `window` object. The functions you see when you type `"test.windowText"` are the functions of the `window` object itself; there are no methods in JavaScript, like in Java. A: When you say `window.windowText` or `"test.windowText"` JavaScript automatically assumes that you are referring to the `window` object's `windowText` property. For example when you do this: `window.property`; It's the same as this: `document.property`; In this case it's `document`.

Vetro VETROLUX is a product or family of products developed and marketed by the Flexibles Seating Company based in Saukville, Minnesota. VETROLUX was the first air-cooled alternative to traditional window air conditioning. VETROLUX is a roof mounted air-cooled condenser and was
