Every time a new skater crop hits the scene, the masses immediately jump on board. It's well documented that you're only as good as your last crop, and it's the same with surf clothing. When a style comes along and gets the whole world on their knees, it usually ends up trashed in a couple seasons. Kyle McCarty is the new kid on the block. If you're not familiar, he's fresh off a triple axel salto in the ISU. He's poised to be one of the top skaters in the world for a very long time. You can tell he knows what he's doing because he was sponsored by Levis, Adidas, and Quiksilver. But he's even better than that. He's managed to craft his own distinctive style to fit him perfectly, and he's got a "futuristic" look that I have to say just might be the most distinct and current surf style out there. It helps that he's also got some killer facial features and an ace attitude. We've got him coming in to the shop for a fitting, so be sure to keep your eyes peeled. New men's clothing is easier to come by these days, but ladies, it's a whole other world out there. Leave the technical stuff to those with higher degrees and more time in the boat, let's just focus on the style and f*ck the engineering. Your Friends Don't Want You To Look This Good Kyle's style is so unique because it's a balance of edgy and laid back. His shirts are just a breath away from being too tight. They flow effortlessly over his broad shoulders and small waist. The pants are just a bit more covered up, but there's enough to let it look nice and neat. And he's just the best kind of guy. To prove this, he even used the boots I personally think are going to be the hottest of the new season. The soft, light weight brown leathers aren't even a blazer in and of themselves. They're just the perfect canvas for the black silhouette. I can already hear the shitstorm of comments from the Internet: "It's too tight, too much denim!", or

Q: Does it exist a command to print the type of an object in C#? I need to print the type of an object in a function. It's a small function, so I don't want to use reflection. I do not want to use the Convert class. I found this in VB.NET

CStr(TypeOf obj) Is it possible to do something similar in C#? A: There is an analog of CStr in C# - System.Runtime.Serialization.Formatters.TypeName. If you know the type and its assembly name, you can use Type.GetType(string): string assembly = Assembly.Load("foo"); Type t = assembly.GetType("Foo.Bar.Baz"); Console.WriteLine(t.Name); A: You can use Assembly.GetCallingAssembly().FullName to get the name of the assembly that called the function. A better answer is to use the TypeDescriptor class: TypeDescriptor.GetConverter(objectToPrint) Now, you only have to do this on the type that you need to print the name of, rather than on every object. A: An alternate way to do this that is generally faster: Console.WriteLine(Type.GetType("Foo.Bar.Baz")); Assuming Foo, Bar and Baz are the namespaces they are in and that you are working with a real type not an instance of a type. Thank you so much for your hard work. You are a blessing in my life. Cheryl Johnson Cheryl Johnson Federal Advocates, Inc. (713) 496-8980 (281) 367-7989 (mobile) (281) 367-8062 (fax) cj19@faa.gov
