The currently available methods for controlling gene expression in a cell-specific manner are insufficient. Here, we report a new method for gene expression control using a combination of photo- and magneto-responsive systems. A photo-responsive iRGD peptide is employed for photodynamic cell targeting and a magneto-responsive diblock copolymer is used for thermal gene delivery. Two different kinds of transducer peptides are introduced into live cancer cells and are individually activated by separate stimuli to induce gene expression. These two stimuli result in synergistic activation of the transducer peptides and the coexistence of two transducer states provide two unique challenges for single cell resolution gene expression control. In this study, cell-specific gene expression in different living cells was visualized using a bioluminescence assay. Our new system will be useful for effective and safe gene therapy.Intracranial leiomyoma: case report. Intracranial leiomyoma is an extremely rare entity. We present a 47-year-old, nulliparous woman with a history of traumatic right frontotemporal headache for the past 1 month. Cranial computed tomography scan showed the presence of a well-defined, hyperdense mass with cystic components in the right frontal region. Magnetic resonance imaging revealed a small hypointense mass with multiple peripheral cysts in the midline, the ventrolateral area of the right frontal lobe, and the right lateral ventricle. The mass was removed completely during craniotomy. Histological examination showed a well-circumscribed, greyish white, lobulated, well-demarcated mass composed of sheets of spindle-shaped cells, with focal areas of cystic degeneration. Immunohistochemistry revealed smooth muscle actin and desmin positivity. Pathological diagnosis of intracranial leiomyoma was made.Q: Dump all indexes in my database I have hundreds of indexes on my database 6d1f23a050
